

This rule is not necessary and would waste enormous precious resources of time and money.
The problems that this rule is trying to solve could easily be remedied by the FCC utilizing its own existing equipment and manpower to find and penalize the guilty operators.

This rule would further overburden the workloads of the existing FCC personell.

A better approach would be to examine each complaint and to make the offending broadcaster responsible for their offense and for them to be made to record all of their broadcasting as outlined in the proposal.

Let each broadcaster be held innocent until accused of a violation and then make the complaintant prove the accusation.
